Adapted Physical Activity (APA) is a service delivery profession and an academic discipline. This study describes outcomes of the European Standards in Adapted Physical Education in the 10 project partner countries were identified. The adapted physical education (APE) were defined in four parts: (1) professional competences of physical education teachers, (2) Functional Map in APE; and (4) Knowledge, Competence and Skills Framework in APE. Outcomes of the project with identified further recommendations for EU Commission were provided in order to promote implementation of inclusive education strategies for students with special education needs in physical education.

INTRODUCTION
The European Union (EU) is an international organization which links 27 countries and operates with wide power to formulate, shape and implement community policy. Since any political system is obligated to respond to the needs of its people, EU is an exception. The however some countries do not use similar terms (i.e. integrated). The idea of inclusion motivated a lot of European countries to approve concrete legislative initiatives aimed at considering the student with SEN not as a guest in school but as a full participant and

Abstract (summary) translate

College Grade Point Average (CGPA) was significantly, positively related to perceived control of time ( $r = .247$ ;  $p < .01$ ), and short term time planning ( $r = .253$ ;  $p < .01$ ), although significantly negatively related to long term planning. Time attitude in contrast, was not significantly related to CGPA ( $r = .018$ ;  $p > .05$ ). Of the background variables, gender of student was significantly and negatively correlated with CGPA ( $r = -.218$ ;  $p < .01$ ), short range planning ( $r = -.215$ ;  $p < .01$ ) and time attitudes ( $r = -.187$ ;  $p < .05$ ). More specifically, female students tended to achieve higher college grades and to score higher on self-reported short range planning and time attitudes than their male counterparts. Entry grade point ( $r = .349$ ) was positively and significantly related to CGPA ( $p < .01$ ). The relationships between year of study, entry grade point, age of student and each of the four time management measures was however low and not significant ( $p > .05$ ). The hypothesis that the females and older age group among the Zimbabwe students of a Shona cultural background would tend to report lower levels of time management was also not supported by the evidence. However, the hypothesis that entry grade point (EGP) is predictive of CGPA was supported.

To assess the variance unique of each of the study variables in explaining CGPA, the reduction in the magnitude of R<sup>2</sup> (symbol not transcribed) associated with the deletion of the specific variable from the forward stepwise regression equation was determined. Table 4 presents unique variance per predictor variable. For instance, taken together, the nine variables explained about 31% ( $p < .001$ ) of the variance in CGPA. Year of study explained a nonsignificant less than one percent (i.e., .002) of the variance in CGPA (.312-.310), whereas each of the time process factors of long term planning and time attitudes accounted for a nonsignificant the
